The robin is an omnivore, which means that it eats both plants and animals. Its diet consists mainly of insects, worms, and berries. Robins also eat small fruits, seeds, and nectar.

In the winter, when food is scarce, robins will often eat scraps of food that are left out by humans. They are particularly fond of birdseed, suet, and fruit.

The robin is a very adaptable bird, and it can be found in a variety of habitats. It is most commonly found in gardens, parks, and woodlands. Robins also live in hedgerows, scrubland, and even urban areas.

Robins need a habitat that provides them with food, shelter, and nesting sites. They prefer areas with dense vegetation, where they can find insects and other food. Robins also need trees or shrubs to build their nests in.
